eBay Inc. (the "Company") has made available through its Investor Relations website (<http://investor.ebayinc.com/>) an audio webcast of President, Chief Executive Officer and Director John J. Donahoe's discussion with Heath P. Terry, a research analyst at Goldman Sachs & Co., at the Goldman Sachs Technology & Internet Conference on February 12, 2014. The following is an excerpt from the transcript of the audio webcast:

Heath P. Terry, Analyst, Goldman Sachs & Co.: "And so you've got two businesses, Payments and Marketplaces, what is it about those two that belong together?"

John J. Donahoe, President, Chief Executive Officer & Director, eBay Inc.: "Well, I've been getting asked this question a lot these days as you can imagine. And look, here is how – what we look at every year, what I look at, what the board looks out is, how can we compete most effectively in the market. And we have come to the conclusion repeatedly over the last several years that eBay and PayPal will grow more successfully together than they would be apart. And the reasons for that are fairly straightforward. eBay offers a captive market for PayPal to build the flywheel, that sort of a flywheel on a flywheel. So initially, PayPal got its new users from eBay for free. PayPal got penetration on eBay, and was able to leverage that into a merchant services business.

Over the last few years, mobile has been the biggest platform shift probably in a decade. PayPal leveraged its mobile payments volume initially completely on eBay, and now it's leveraging it off eBay. PayPal is driving penetration of credit on eBay which is allowing it to be more successful off eBay. So the first and most fundamental reason is being able to build momentum on eBay enables PayPal to be more successful off eBay.

Secondly, PayPal's secret sauce is risk management. Right? As you know, Heath, we guarantee both sides of a transaction, buyers and sellers. And in risk, more data is good. And PayPal has $212 billion of transaction data including all the rich eBay data, which allows the risk models to be more effective. So in an era of Big Data, you sort of say why would you cut that.

And then last but not least, eBay gives PayPal a powerful financial foundation to be more aggressive off eBay. So eBay delivers 30% of PayPal's new users for free, no cost, 30% of its revenue and half its profits. That allows PayPal to be even more aggressive pursuing large merchants and having lower take rates or going global or many of the investment areas we're making. And so, it allows that financial foundation gives PayPal that ability to be aggressive.

And then eBay Inc.'s balance sheet helps PayPal grow more quickly as well. As you know, we got $10 billion of offshore cash. We are using that offshore cash to fund Bill Me Later receivables, a great low-cost capital way of doing that. And our balance sheet allows PayPal to be aggressive in acquisitions like Braintree and grabbing an opportunity.

So, we believe that PayPal will grow faster as part of eBay and we believe eBay grows faster having PayPal because of things like Money Back Guarantee, the eBay Buyer Protection. So, we think the synergies are strong. And I have said, if and when we think those synergies have run their course or one business would be better off independent from the other will be rational, the same way we're rational with Skype four, five years ago."
