Gillette responds to Massachusetts Secretary of State William Galvin

As many Gillette associates are aware, the Massachusetts Secretary of State, William Galvin, has started an inquiry into the background of Gillette's planned merger with Procter & Gamble. Secretary Galvin has stated that he is concerned about the merger's size and the benefits and compensation to be provided for Gillette executives.

Gillette said that it would fully cooperate with this inquiry and on Friday, the Company responded to the initial set of questions posed by Secretary Galvin.

Many associates may have read news stories over the weekend in which Secretary Galvin criticized the completeness of Gillette's response. Everyone should know that the Company intends to continue to cooperate with Secretary Galvin and make sure he has the information he needs.

The questions answered by the Company centered on the documentation for our board's decision, the advice provided by our investment bankers, the compensation arrangements for these bankers and for our senior executives. One question also focused on details of potential job losses at Gillette resulting from the merger.

Gillette's responses provided the requested information or committed to provide such information when it becomes available, including the requested shareholder proxy for the merger, which has yet to be filed with the SEC. Information on executive compensation was provided and had previously been publicly available.

As to potential job losses, there is no information beyond the previous overall estimate of the combined P&G and Gillette workforces. More specific information will only be developed as part of the detailed integration planning for the merger which cannot begin for some time. The process itself will take a number of months, because the Company will be engaged in a careful, thoughtful and thorough review. The combined company is committed to fielding the best team, consisting of both Gillette and Procter & Gamble people.

As promised, Gillette associates will be kept thoroughly abreast of the process and our decisions.
